

Are global equity markets shifting in our favour?

Last month we wrote about the Japanese yen—a major position for us that finally seems to be at a turning point. But the recent moves in stocks are worth a look, too. Global equity markets have been just as lively—and just as encouraging.

In markets, sometimes good news is good news, sometimes bad news is good news, and sometimes, good news isn't good enough news. The last two months have seen all three varieties in the US alone. Inflation ticked down, which is good news for the economy and for markets. Yet manufacturing orders tanked, job creation slowed, and jobless claims accelerated. Bad news for the economy, but good news for markets, as the weakness urges the Fed to cut interest rates. Though a weaker economy is typically bad news for small firms, they have outperformed handily. That's partly because lower rates would reduce their interest costs, and partly because good news for some big firms wasn't good enough to beat stretched expectations.

It's a lot to process. Even if we knew the headlines in advance, we'd still struggle to predict what they would all mean for stocks. So we focus instead on what we are good at—analysing individual businesses.

Few businesses are immune to broader economic forces, but for most of them, it simply isn't the most important thing, and what makes or breaks one company may be totally irrelevant to another. Nintendo creates video games and consoles, but isn't remotely concerned with vehicle-based payments. Corpay operates niche payment networks, but has no interest in video games. The service quality of freight carriers matters enormously to RXO but not at all to Shinhan Financial Group. Many of these businesses across our Strategies have recently outperformed, and when the performance of what you own is idiosyncratic, it is a bit easier to tune out the broader market noise.

At times over the past year, that noise has felt loud, even when the companies we hold have been delivering good results. Our Global Equity Strategy generated better returns last November and December than it did this July and August. But with the market outpacing us late last year, it sure didn't feel that way! To use an Olympics analogy, we had great race times, but our competition was on a tear, and gold gets all the attention.

We weren't throwing in the towel then, and we aren't resting now. Yet we do see reasons for excitement. The opportunity set has for years led us more towards value over growth stocks, financials and industrials over tech names, and mid-sized firms over giants. That's been uncomfortable at points this year. But over the past two months, value has led growth, "old economy" shares have bested tech, and smaller companies have beaten goliaths. Broadly, what we own has done well, and what we don't own has suffered—in relative terms, July was the Global Equity Strategy's best month since the global financial crisis.

This is a pattern we've seen throughout history. At some point in every bull market, investors come to appreciate the value of previously unloved shares, while demanding more of those in favour. Take Nvidia. Despite reporting results most businesses can only dream of—sales and earnings both grew >120% in a single year—its price fell by 6% the following day. When expectations get too high, good news isn't good enough news.

Nvidia is not alone. The stocks that suffered most during the recent volatility were those whose valuations—and expectations—were most stretched coming into it.

Our goal is to find the opposite: companies where expectations are low. Companies where good news really is good news, and even bad news can be positive if it's less bad than expected. This also provides a measure of downside protection—it is far harder to disappoint pessimists than optimists.

In aggregate, the companies in our Global Equity Strategy trade for less than 17 times consensus estimates of next year's earnings, versus 24 times for the MSCI World Index. In our view, that gap leaves our portfolio with plenty of room for pleasant surprises—and the benchmark with little room for error.

Past performance is not a reliable indicator of future results. The value of investments in the Orbis Funds may fall as well as rise and you may get back less than you originally invested. It is therefore important that you understand the risks involved before investing. This report represents Orbis' view at a point in time and provides reasoning or rationale on why we bought or sold a particular security for the Orbis Funds. We may take the opposite view/position from that stated in this report. This is because our view may change as facts or circumstances change. This report constitutes general advice only and not personal financial product, tax, legal, or investment advice, and does not take into account the specific investment objectives, financial situation or individual needs of any particular person. This report does not prohibit the Orbis Funds from dealing in the securities before or after the report is published.

Disclaimer

The contents of this communication have been approved for issue in the United Kingdom by Orbis Investments (U.K.) Limited which is authorised and regulated by the Financial Conduct Authority. Orbis Investments (U.K.) Limited and Orbis Investment Management Limited are members of the Orbis group of companies ("Orbis").

This communication does not constitute an offer, solicitation or recommendation to buy, sell or hold any interests, shares or other securities in the companies mentioned in it. Orbis has not considered the suitability of this investment against your individual needs and risk tolerance. You must not rely upon this communication or any part of it as investment advice and Orbis does not assume and will not accept responsibility or liability (whether arising in contract, tort, negligence or otherwise) for any error, omission, loss or damage (whether direct, indirect, consequential or otherwise) in connection with the information in this communication and disclaims any such liability to the maximum extent permitted by law. This communication represents Orbis' view at the date stated and may provide reasoning or rationale on why we bought or sold a particular security for a fund. We may take a different/the opposite view/position from that stated. This is because our view may change as facts or circumstances change. This communication has not been prepared in accordance with legal requirements designed to promote the independence of investment research. Entities and employees of Orbis are not subject to restrictions on dealing in relevant securities ahead of the dissemination of this review.

Past performance is not a reliable indicator of future results. When investing your capital is at risk.